The accu voltage is fixed for any given signal/load combination. The accu can be linked to either the positive or negative lead of the signal source. If the signal is 4.5V p-p or 5V p-p, it is applied to the accu directly. If the signal source is a 5V p-p signal, it is applied to the accu via a 1K resistor. This 1K resistor also protects the accu from noise on the signal. The resistors will have to be chosen to achieve a reasonable load impedance for the accu (say, 1k ohms). I must say, I like the idea of using a pyro. I have recently designed a 4s lipo power supply for a pyro, it will basically take a 12v battery and regulate it down to 12v, will have a lipo charging circuit, and has a switch (and backup) that can let you select the input voltage of the regulator. It does all the conduction currents (2A+ on high, 1.2A on low) while supplying a constant 12v output. It has a 0.5A current limit to protect it from over voltage/current. It's very very high efficient. It will also regulate the input voltage down to a minimum of 9v, it does a decent job on the 14v - 18v range (as well as being able to deliver to a 20v resistor), but the power output is limited to 40W max. It has a switching mode boost mode as well. I like your idea, but I am afraid you will get killed for this - you are talking about using a pyro to make a micro.Nets extend training camp invitees It's not an exclusive club anymore. The NBA has extended invitations to a slew of players from college programs around the country, and brought some Nets camp invitees along with them. The news came to light on Tuesday, as the Nets extended offers to several veteran players currently on NBA training camps. A slew of players from D-League teams, colleges and high schools around the country are also part of the training camp process, which will begin on Sept 82157476af
